RUNAWAY

Accident Came Near Resulting Fatally For Mr. and Mrs. Herr.

Children Have Scarlet Fever—Mrs. James Trigg Is Poor Health—Harrod's Creek News Letter.

By W. S. Kemp.

Harrod's Creek, March 28.—While returning home from making some calls on Sunday evening Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Herr were thrown from their buggy and painfully injured. Mrs. Herr was thrown into a wire fence and received several cuts on the head and face, and her husband was pulled over the dashboard and was rendered unconscious by falling on his head. On reaching home they were attended by Dr. J. A. Freeman and Dr. J. L. Quisenberry. The accident was caused by one of the shafts becoming detached from the buggy which struck the horse's legs and caused him to run away.

The two children of Mr. and Mrs. John S. Waters, who had been scarlet fever, are improving. Mrs. Walters, also, has been very ill, but is now convalescent. Two trained nurses have been in charge of Mr. Waters and the children John Jr., and Archie, for some time.

Whooping cough and mumps are prevalent around this place and Prospect.

Mr. P. P. Huston, of Louisville, will soon erect a new house on his country place, "Huston Hills," on the Prospect farm.

Mr. James Trigg, of Prospect, who is in his 94th year, has been in poor health for some time, but as he has a strong constitution his friends hope for his early recovery.

CHAPTER XVI. MISSED.

Floy was imprisoned in the western wing of the old house and the rest of the party were in the front part of the time of her mishap. She might have screamed forever for all the good it would have done her, but Floy did not know this, and after a time she ceased crying, and set up a series of yells that made the old house ring. She called each one of the party again and again until she was quite hoarse. Finding this would do no good she stopped screaming and took refuge in tears. Presently she spied an iron hook fastened to the wall about a foot below the opening. She began taking off her white skirt which she tore into strips. They were quite new and strong, but after a great deal of trouble, she at last succeeded in tearing them to pieces. Then she set to work to manufacture a ladder. She worked diligently and at last the ladder was finished. But now came the most difficult task—to fasten the ladder to the hook. She tried again and again to throw it over, but it would not catch. Her arms grew tired and at last she lost her temper.

"Plague take the thing!" she cried, giving the rope an angry fling, and as she did it caught on the hook. Floy picked up the hankle which she had found and put it into her pocket. Then she sat down upon the floor and removed her shoes and flung them aside. Seizing each side of the ladder she put her foot into the first loop and began climbing. The frail ladder stretched to a mere thread, but Floy never hesitated. She climbed up until she reached the end of the ladder; then throwing one arm across the wall she secured a firm grasp and drew herself up onto the broad ledge, with a sigh of relief. The place was large enough for her to sit there quite comfortably, and taking off her large hat she began to fan herself with it, seemingly very well content.

The rest of the party were in the front part of the house and grounds. Larnie Gilman was seated upon a huge stone, sketching different parts of the old house, and Nina stood watching him, leaning against a stone pillar, and making a veritable picture in her simple white dress with a spray of wild pink roses at her throat and one in the coils of her black hair. Ned and Gladys were walking up and down the front porch, shaded from the hot sun by the rank, unkempt vines of bitter-sweet and honeysuckle, that clambered up the stone pillars, and wound around the balusters, forming a natural lattice. Charlie and Lara were gathering white roses from a bush that grew near the front entrance. They were talking upon commonplace subjects. After a time they left the bush, which they had almost stripped of its snowy blossoms, and went in search of the others. They found Nina and Larnie first. Larnie was still sketching, but Nina had seated herself upon an old iron settle and was wreathing a garland of wild roses.

"Excuse us, if we are interrupting you, Mr. Gilman," said Lara, as she and Charlie approached, "but we have come to say that we are thinking of going home. It is getting quite late. See what lengthy shadows the trees are casting?"

"You are not interrupting me, Miss Marsden," replied Larnie. "I have just finished this sketch, which is the prettiest of any I have drawn to-day. How do you like it, Miss Hazelton?" handing it to her.

Nina took the sketch, expecting to see a portion of the quaint old castle drawn upon the paper; but to her surprise, and delight, she saw a sketch of herself as she sat with her lap full of wild-roses and with a white handkerchief of the same held in her right hand, at which she was gazing in a birdlike fashion.

"Oh, how pretty," exclaimed Nina. "How you have flattered me."

"I have hardly done you justice," said he with a smile, "but if you like the sketch you may keep it." Nina thanked him, and after showing it to the admiring Charlie and Lara, put it in her pocket, hardly knowing whether to be disappointed or pleased. "Why did he not keep it himself," she thought a little piqued. Larnie gathered up his drawing materials and then in his pockets, and after calling to Ned and Gladys who were still on the porch, they left the old house and walked back toward where they had left Floy and Fred. But they had traversed hardly half the distance when they met Fred.

"Where is Floy?" said he.

CHAPTER XVII. THE LITTLE LOCKET.

After parting with Nina, Larnie walked back to where they had left Fred intending to give him Floy's message. Finding him asleep, he did not awaken him thinking it would make no difference as Floy was probably joining the rest of the party at the ruins. So, taking a large wedge of cake from one of the baskets, Larnie climbed into the buggy and sat there contentedly munching as if she had not just eaten a hearty dinner. Uncle Sam had taken a bus-ket and his fishing tackle, and gone to the river for the purpose of filling out Aunt Cleo's command, which was "Bebe on a 'ketch fish 'nuff fo' supper." So there was nothing to disturb Fred, and he slept long and peacefully. He might have slept longer perhaps, but Neptune awoke stretching out his forepaw, uttered that peculiar sound between a howl and a growl which dogs are wont to give when they yawn. Fred awoke with a start to find that the party had not returned yet. He sat up and espied Larnie in the buggy fast asleep.

"Kew!" he called loud enough to awaken the dead, "where is Miss Floy?"

"What a—er—er is it, Mr. Fred?" she started, rubbing her eyes.

"Where is Miss Floy, I say?"

"O, she done gone to de ruins long ago."

"Come to de ruins alone?" gasped Fred.

"Yessah! I specs she's done katched up wid de udders long 'fore dis," replied Nina. "She tole me if I seed 'yo' to tell 'vo' she done gone."

"Well, didn't you see me?"

"Yessah, but 'vo' was asleep an' I was 'feared to wake 'vo' was the reply."

Fred said no more, but seizing his hat from the ground, crammed it upon his head and started toward the ruins. On his way he met the others returning.

"Where is Floy?" he repeated as no one answered him.

"Floy has not been with us," said Ned. "We have not seen her since we left her with you."

"No, we have not seen her," replied the others.

"Where can she be?" said Fred in a startled tone. "She and Nance left me and went to the cabin, where Floy changed her dress and left for the ruins."

"O, dear, maybe she has gotten into no mischief," said Nina, trying to look that serious, as she observed Fred's troubled countenance.

"I guess not," said Ned cheerfully. "We have missed her, that is all, and she is probably enjoying herself very much rambling about among the ruins. But I must go in search of her. For it is getting late, and time we were started for home."

"I will go with you, Ned," said Fred.

"Let us all go," said Gladys.

They all returned to the old house. They entered the back way, as Floy had done, and traversed all the lower rooms. They had reached the broad flight of steps when Larnie Gilman stooped and picked something from the floor.

"My God! how came this here?" he cried excitedly, holding up a tiny silver heart fastened to a blue silk cord.

"I suppose Floy must have dropped it here," said Ned, "though I do not remember having seen it about her neck today."

"No, for I think she brought it in her pocket," interrupted Gladys. "I remember having seen it in the pocket of her blue dress yesterday."

"How strange," said Larnie, looking intently at the bauble, "for this belongs to my sister Crystal."

"I beg your pardon, my friend, you are mistaken. That belongs to my sister," said Ned with a faint gleam of anger in his clear gray eyes.

Larnie looked at him in amazement.

"How came your sister in possession of it? I am sure when I left my home in Philadelphia my little sister Crystal had this in her possession, and now I find it here. It is very strange, indeed. I can prove that it belongs to her," he added, pressing a spring at which the locket flew open, disclosing the pictured faces of two young men. Triumphant he held the locket up to the view of all.

"Well! that doesn't prove anything," stoutly maintained Ned. "This isn't the first time we have seen those pictures. 'This,' pointing to the picture in the left locket, 'is the likeness of my Uncle Gerald Hazelton, who died in Brazil before I was born, and the opposite picture is that of my uncle's dearest friend, Harry Gilman, who, after my uncle's death, sent this locket together with some other trinkets to my father, uncle Gerald's twin brother. Harry Gilman and my uncle met in Brazil and became fast friends. They were together when my uncle died, and it was Harry Gilman who wrote the letter to my father telling of his brother's death. The letter was sent with the box of trinkets, among which was this locket. My father gave the locket to my sister Floy."

Ned spoke in a rapid, slightly angered tone, for it vexed him to have Larnie-Gilman contradict him. When he had finished speaking there was silence for a moment. Larnie stood looking from one pointed face to the other; but as the truth gradually dawned upon him, the look of wonder left his face, and, stepping forward, he laid the locket in Ned's hand, saying:

"I see how it is. You say this Gerald Hazelton was your uncle? How singular, I never thought of the similarity of names before. This man whom you call your uncle's dearest friend was my father."

There was exclamations of surprise from all as Larnie finished.

"Then there must be two lockets exactly alike," said Ned.

"Yes, and that solves the mystery," answered Larnie. "As you say, your uncle and my father were great friends and soon after they met they exchanged pictures. Each had one of these little silver lockets made in which to keep the pictures. They vowed to always be faithful to each other, and that their children after them should be the same. So why should not we fulfill the wishes of our beloved parents?" and Larnie held out the locket to Ned.

Ned grasped the outstretched hand, and shook it cordially, after which there was a general handshaking and a few more trivial explanations, and they passed on in search of Floy.

SEATONVILLE.

March 22.—Miss Bessie Pound spent Wednesday afternoon with Mrs. J. W. Turner.

F. A. Tenill and family had as their guests Thursday night, Miss Mollie Hon and Mr. Jim Howell and wife.

Miss Mrs. Elmer King are receiving congratulations on the arrival of a baby girl, born March 16.

Quite a number from here attended the funeral of Mr. John Smith, Sunday at King's church, and again Monday at the same place was held the funeral of Mrs. Jim Tom Reid.

We feel that we have lost two good friends and neighbors. We extend to them our deepest sympathy in their great loss.

Mr. J. A. Tenill and family entertained the Singing Club Thursday.

R. J. Nicholson, wife and little daughter, Lucille, visited Mrs. Mattie Bridwell Sunday.

Miss Stella Bridwell returned home Monday, after visiting Misses Kemp Sweeney and Sallie Jones.

R. W. Bruce and family and William King and family spent Sunday with J. M. King and family.

P. L. Jean and family spent Tuesday with G. S. Mills and family.

Who To Spray Peach Trees.

Mr. M. B. Taylor, of Greensburg, Ky., asked when is the "time to spray peach trees." To answer this question fully would require considerable space. The time is spray depends somewhat on the special trouble one desires to prevent or remedy. If the purpose is to prevent or eradicate scale spraying should be done in winter or early spring, before any buds or foliage appears.

In a general way, for preventing fungus or other diseases attacking foliage, buds or fruit, it is usually best to spray once or twice in the spring, just before and about the time buds commence swelling and again after fruit is formed and the blossoms have fallen. It is not thought good to spray while trees are full bloom. —Farmers Home Journal.

EXTENSION
Still Trying To Extend, Writes
O. G. Whizz.

Characteristic Letter From One Of The Jeffersonian's Best Correspondents—Up-to-date Alphabet.

End-of-line, March the Equinox—The weather is still fine, although it is time for the Equinox, or the sun crossing the line, and yet we are not looking to extend, and we are unable to call any place our permanent location.
The cars started to go over the route of the proposed extension last Sunday evening, but the car that intended to go through got behind the car billed for Fern Creek and, therefore, had to stop. They compromised the matter by calling the outfit a double-header, and everybody was satisfied.
It seems to us poor benighted heathens that it would be more convenient to the traveling public if the car bosses would run a half-hour line instead of a double-header with green flags only every hour. Maybe we don't know, but there are others who have the same think. But everybody can't have a "mule sense," even if they can brag like its father.
Motorman James got Schott and arrived at End-of-line at 5:29. He was able to return and met Smith, but not with a Hurst who was followed by the immortal Jones, who tries to make Fred believe he has had under Hack—all good people.
Mrs. William J. Barnett, of Owensboro, who was to meet the Mule. The husband creature will refuse to help us arrange the news for The Jeffersonian.
Who its columns will allow.
We hope for all this news power now and hope for consolation—
The Jeffersonian.

We would like to ask if district No. 5 has a trustee. If so, does he have the power to repair the house, well, fence, or any part of school property? If he has, why don't he attend to the matter, or why don't the big trustee of all see about the matter? We have the money, need the repairs, and don't ask or expect any other district to help us or to spend our private fund for other schools.

Hurrah for a return of the "good old times"—sociality, industry, usefulness and plenty to eat, and plenty to talk about. We have reference to the "quiltin' bee" given by Mrs. J. B. Finley. Those present were Mesdames J. McCullough, Frank Stivers, J. C. Bruce, H. Walbridge, J. C. Bates, E. B. Berry, Newton Thorne, Ella Shroat, Melissa Nutter, Misses Sue Stivers, Maud Fryer and Pansy Finley. They finished the quilt, but couldn't catch the cat to try their fortunes. But one thing, Mrs. Finley did justice to the fine dinner prepared by the noted cooks, Mrs. Shroat and Mrs. Finley. Everything was good and in plenty and every one was pleased and all hope that some one else will put a quilt in.
